

Japanese Distribution Box Craftsmanship

Overview

These boxes are called tomobako, and are traditionally made from kiri or paulownia wood. In fact most will have an artist's stamp that crosses the lid/base joint so the lid is always placed with correct. This is the process of attaching the lid and bottom to the framework just before the glue dries completely. Exploring how Japan's reverence for boxes—crafted from paulownia wood, lacquer, and cloth—reflects centuries of artistry, order, and cultural meaning. "Boxes Almost as Valuable as What They Contain" by Nick Haramis (The New York Times, April 22, 2025) This article explores Japan's centuries-old.
